MARKET COMMENT (BASED ON THE SICAV REFERENCE CURRENCY)

January 2025 was an eventful month for European equity markets. The inauguration of Donald Trump as the 47th U.S. president signaled a change in international dynamics and economic forecasts. On January 27th, the markets faced a significant sell-off triggered by a new Chinese player in the AI-field, DeepSeek, which put into question the stretched valuations of the AI-related cluster of stocks. The MSCI Europe TR Net index saw overall gains over the month as investors responded positively to reduced inflationary pressures. Positive earnings reports from key companies provided some relief and maintained investor interest, despite late month volatility. Sector wise, the Consumer Durables sector excelled, driven by strong earnings publications (Richemont). In contrast, the Transportation sector faced increased costs and operational challenges amid variable fuel prices and regulatory pressures. As a consequence, the underweight in the Materials sector contributed positively with a +0.1% allocation effect. The overweight in Staples Retailing brought a negative allocation effect of -0.2%, impacted by competitive pricing and restrained consumer spending. Country wise, Sweden stood out with robust economic fundamentals and a strong consumer sector, achieving a 2.1% relative performance. Conversely, Denmark underperformed with a lag of 8.6%, weighed down by uncertainties in pharmaceutical exports (Novo Nordisk) and challenging regulatory conditions. In the end, favorable underweight in the United Kingdom provided a 0.1% positive effect as the pound weakened. The underweight in France brought -0.1% allocation effect as the Luxury sector, in particular LVMH, rebounded. Style wise, the portfolio's emphasis on Low Volatility offered stability with a positive though limited performance of the factor. Exposure to the Quality and Momentum factors contributed positively, as investors favored fundamentally sound equities in volatile conditions. The Value factor suffered a bit. At the stock level, the overweight in UniCredit made the most significant positive impact, contributing 0.15% on the back of strong financial results and strategic moves boosting investor confidence. Henkel (Pfd) detracted -0.16% from performance due to operational challenges affecting its earnings outlook. Overall, January, the Uni-Global - Defensive European Equities portfolio returned 5.2%, trailing the MSCI Europe TR Net benchmark's 7.1% gain. Overall, the Uni-Global - Defensive European Equities portfolio lagged behind the benchmark given the strong bull market, though the upside capture is very satisfactory.
